

My Proudest Achievement

My name is Pushkar Deshmane. I am from India. When someone ask me about the proud moment of my life my struggling, learning and achieving cycle from my previous job comes to my mind. I was working as a Software Developer in small organization named “Smart Research Global, Belgaum, Karnataka, India” being a small organization I have been assigned with the entire project called “BidHub” I had to work on it right from scratch. Honestly in initial days I struggled as I have to perform multiple roles like analyzing requirements, designing framework for the project, database designing and long meetings with my team. But this was the phase of my life when I learned plethora of things, my manager was happy to see me growing and learning.

The most important aspect in that project was complete ownership to me. Right from requirement gathering to deployment and customer interaction I played an important role. In this period of time I got chance to work with teams other than Software Developers, which gave me idea about how it is important for a software engineer to have some domain knowledge so that he/she can code and satisfy the customers need. Throughout this journey I learned many things. I made lots of mistakes as well, but it helped me understanding the do’s and don’ts. I feel so proud when I launched the web application “BidHub” and it has around 15 active clients from US who use this application on daily basis. In this journey my team (all seniors and juniors) was always there to support and guide me. I am grateful to have that opportunity and always would love to implement things which I learned in coming future for the betterment of organization.
